My mother used to say when it sounded so dull that it was a sure sign of another death. I have thought of it since, and believe it to be true, though Conway is a healthy place. There is a deal of difference, she continued, in the sounding of the bell. My parents had the church before me; so I know all about these things. I had the place after my mother. Willing to turn her thoughts from anticipated deaths, we now inquire after the dead man, whose funeral bell is such a melancholy prognostic. He was Morris Evans, one of the singers here. I knew him well, she replied. When he was strong and came to church, his place was near the organ, amongst the singers. Come, I will mow it you. There, she said, this was his seat, close by the wall, you see, under the carved stone with the little figures upon it. He was ill a long time, and died of a decline, like his father and mother. There is nobody left now but his sister and an old uncle. At this point some one entered to fay that the clerk was gone for the clergyman, and the funeral was moving off. We therefore took the seats which the melancholy woman assigned to us, whilst she stood aside near the open door and wiped away her tears with the duster. The funeral is evidently on its way; a number...
