The cerebral hemispheres are smooth, oval bodies, broadest behind, and closely approximated in the middle line. Each contains a lateral ventricle, the inner wall of which presents an elevation, the corpus striatum, and which communicates with the third ventricle behind by a small aperture, the foramen of Munro. The olfactory lobes are two small bodies in front of and continuous with the cerebral hemispheres, from which they are not very clearly marked off. They are closely united in the middle line, and each contains an olfactory ventricle continuous with the lateral ventricle of its side. The mid-brain is a small axial part lying immediately behind the thalamencephalon, with which it is directly continuous. It contains a narrow canal, the Sylvian aqueduct, which passes in front into the third ventricle. Its roof
