The female is similarly colored, but duller. It p.rcters the snowbanks and glaciers, picking up seeds and fj? e!ing upon insects found about the hanks of the melting snow. In yinter it comes into the valleys along with the first driving snow storms. It has a medium heavy bill that is black in summer and yellow in winter; a black crown bordered with gray, the gray not-spreading down; the general body color deep cinnamon brown with thin, blackish streaks; upper tail feathers, wings and tail, pinkish. The second specimen of this bird, as known to science, was taken in Utah by Captain Stansbury, on May 1, 1850, 25 years after Swainson had taken the first one to London from the Arctic regions. These birds have thejiabit of starting up from the ground, the whole flock all at once, not one after the other,...
